

I was asked by a private equity firm to write a strategic technology review of one of their holding companies. Ms. Larson's services were invaluable in making a dense topic accessible to senior management. I believe I made a better impression with her help.

In this day and age when mastery of the English language is (sadly) becoming a lost art, it is a great discovery to find an editor of Debbie Larson's skill and accuracy. I consider myself to be a good writer and a good proof reader, but Debbie's eye on my work not only saved me embarrassment professionally, it assured me that nothing was missed. In this case, scrutiny isn't painful, it's rewarding.

Debbie, thanks for your comments on this final chapter. I intend to incorporate virtually everything you've suggested. These past days, as I've read through the entire manuscript, I've often stopped cold at something that didn't seem to work. I found it extremely helpful to go back to your comments for that particular chapter. I can't tell you how many times you put your finger on the issue. Thanks again for all you've done.
